Are politicians listening to the skilled crafts sector? – Taking stock of the first few months of government

The black-red coalition has set itself ambitious goals and made even more promises. How should the federal government's start be assessed from the perspective of the skilled trades? What have the 100-day program and other initiatives achieved? As a location-based economic sector, the skilled trades need competitive framework conditions. This requires, not least, political reliability and the courage to implement genuine structural reforms. This keynote speech will address the extent to which politicians are on track and where there is a need for action or even correction.
